Travel & Visit Index - Lakeside Residence

Total Score: 2.0/5.0 (A Museum of Rock and Wood Sculpture in Detroit Suburbs)

1. Privacy & Accessibility

- Private Collector's Retreat, No Visitors: This is a Private Residence located in Birmingham, Michigan, USA, designed for an Asian art curator and collector. It serves not only as a living space but also as a private museum for precious collections, thus the interior is not open to the public.
- Sculpture in the Park: The house sits on a park-like site traversed by the River Rouge. Although inaccessible, its unique Y-shaped volume and dark slate facade make it stand like a massive modern sculpture within the natural landscape, possibly visible from nearby park paths.

2. Architecture like a Sliced Apple

- Cold Outside, Warm Inside: Architect Jonathan Disbrow describes the design as "slicing an apple". The exterior is cold, dark Buckingham Slate, while the interior is warm, bright Ash Wood. This strong contrast symbolizes the transition from a protective outer layer to a soft living core.
- Veins of Light and Shadow: The slate on the facade is not just decoration; it reveals different textures and mineral veins as the sunlight changes. If you pass by at different times of the day, you will find this black house has rich expressions.

3. Symbiosis of Collection & Landscape

- Built for Art: The owner is an expert in Asian art, and every corner of the house, even an ash wood bench, is meticulously designed to display their collection. Although we cannot see the Japanese woodblock prints inside, the architecture's extreme attention to materials allows us to feel a tribute to "craftsmanship."
- Borrowed Scenery: Massive glass walls bring the undulating terrain and carefully layered plants indoors, making the landscape part of the interior design.
