Project - Nestled within a housing complex in Yakarta, Indonesia, the recently completed ID House by Wahana Architects masterfully blends indoor and outdoor living across its 500 square meters. Guiding the design is a central goal - to create shared spaces that encourage connection between family members. This ethos manifests through thoughtful spatial arrangements across the home's three floors, culminated by a large central void that bridges communal areas. Split across tri-level floors, the home features an open-plan first floor that dissolves boundaries between living spaces and the outdoor garden. The seamless flow between interior and exterior creates a tranquil environment in harmony with nature. Upstairs, the second floor houses private bedrooms alongside a family room and home office connected by the open void. This impressive architectural feat forges cohesion between the family room below and dining area above, promoting togetherness. Crowning the home, the third floor provides quiet personal retreats with the master bedroom and children's bedrooms. Dedicated to relaxation and solitude, these rooms allow privacy while the lower levels remain communal. From its tranquil integration of indoor/outdoor to impressive floating architectural details, the ID House is a testament to design that connects.

Design Team - Believing architecture transcends forms to shape lives, Wahana Architects places people at the heart of their humanistic design process. Rather than forcing inhabitable spaces to conform to rigid plans, the studio adapts flowing forms to satisfy user needs. This psychology-driven approach stems from a conviction that buildings failing user needs fail their very purpose. Success lies not in visual appeal alone but in understanding personalities, fulfilling identities, and enabling connections. Such harmony between spaces and inhabitants enables true dwelling. From initial concepts to supervised construction, Wahana Architects' holistic process attunes buildings to those they serve. Through intimate client collaboration, they craft resonant spaces where people feel understood, at home with themselves and others. Such thoughtfulness breathed life into their award-winning INDE Shortlisted and ArchDaily nominated projects.
